

When your whole family spends a day together

is it like you're
,000 miles apart?

Being close is more than just being physically near someone. Being a family means more than just living together. A family is based on love, and real love can only grow through one's relationship with others.

To love, one must know how to give as well as receive. When we can give ourselves in love, we can honestly love our selves. Then, we have gained a degree of maturity, and with this we can establish secure families.

Unless this mature love is the foundation at the start of a marriage, it cannot be passed on to children. Instead, an inability to maturely love has been inherited from generation to generation.

As parents, absolute values must be taught to give children the freedom to grow. Yet today's generation senses hypocrisy in their parents' actions. They are right! These standards are not being realized. From this conflict between ideal and reality, the family has lost its unity and common purpose. So a family can spend a day together and really be miles apart.

The family unit is the essential foundation of a healthy society. Until our roots are solid we cannot hope to build anything greater. No urban, national, or international problem can ultimately be solved until we solve our problems at home.

Through a practical philosophy of love, called the Unification Principle, we have found the means to combat our difficulties on every level: from gaining freedom and maturity as individuals to gaining unity as a nation and world.

Problems begin at home. Let's unify the family. It can change the world.
