Healing the Past

Unificationists Honor African Burial Site in New York City

As a team of young Unificationists continues their journey across America on the Peace Road 2020: Reconciling All People national tour, a tributary stop among local clergy and public officials honored an African burial site beneath the Civic Center section of Lower Manhattan in New York on July 31. A large group gathered to offer prayers and messages of peace and reconciliation in Foley Square, near the African Burial Ground National Monument, where more than 400 graves were discovered in 1991.

“We are here to bring remembrance, healing, and reconciliation,” said Rev. Juanita Pierre-Louis, co-pastor of Harlem Family Church and senior vice president of Women’s Federation for World Peace (WFWP) USA. “We want to remember these people and we want to heal them as well. We have to come together and work together to bring reconciliation.”

For more than a century, tracts of land under New York City’s foundation were designated for enslaved and free black people in an unmarked cemetery where 419 men, women, and children have been exhumed so far—making it the oldest and largest known excavated burial ground in North America. Peace Road participants offered inspiring words of healing and liberation as an important part of making peace with the past to bring reconciliation.

“We want to remember these people and we want to heal them as well.”
