Release the Mother of Peace

By Rev. Demian Dunkley

When I try to reduce the entire case against Dr. Hak Ja Han to a single phrase, nothing captures it more accurately than this familiar Korean expression: “fire, ready, aim.” It describes acting before thinking—and that is exactly what has unfolded from the very beginning of this investigation.

The premise is simple and, by now, difficult to dispute. From the beginning, this investigation moved in a direction that had little to do with measured justice. It was selective in the targets it pursued, unusually aggressive in its methods, and propelled by leaks that shaped early media narratives long before any evidence was tested in court. Those narratives are now giving way as new facts emerge. What is happening now is clear: both the government and the prosecution have revealed a politically motivated purge, and when such an effort is directed at a major religious figure and her movement, it matches exactly what the international community recognizes as religious persecution.

This is why I believe Dr. Han, the Mother of Peace, should now be released, acquitted, and offered an apology. From there, we should work with other churches and civic leaders to safeguard the religious freedoms of all Koreans, whether they be religious or not. As Pastor Mark Burns put it, "It's not just about your freedom of religion; it's about your right to be free."

It should now be clear to anyone who has been watching. The pattern we have witnessed since July becomes unmistakable: it was not the slow, careful work of justice, but a sequence of shots fired followed by poor explanations.
