

IAED USA Webinar: Fertility vs. Financial Success - What Policies Can Promote Both?

Roger Wetherall
October 17, 2025

Webinar: Tuesday, Oct 21, 2 – 3 PM (EST)

Dear

One of the cruelest aspects of modern life is that while the life cycle has slowed dramatically (we finish education later, we move out of the parental home later, we start making real money later and we marry later), the fertility window hasn't budged at all.

Modern birth control has allowed us to take control of our fertility and delay having children much longer than ever before, and there are plenty of things to do with the extra years of youth, from more education to career building, travel and much more. But this delay is taking a terrible toll. Fertility rates have plunged far below replacement in nearly every developed country, and in most countries, people are falling far short of their desired fertility. Is it possible to promote policies that enable young people to have both financial stability and children or are these goals mutually exclusive? Daniel Hess, one of the most outspoken advocates for prenatal polices will present his ideas and discuss the options.

About the Speaker

Daniel Hess

Daniel Hess is a graduate of Cornell University Engineering. He has worked in intellectual property for many years, but became focused on demography after the realization that many of the most innovative countries, such as Japan and Korea, have extremely low and falling birthrates that threaten the future of society.

Daniel writes on the popular X account @MoreBirths, with a following of more than 40,000, about the low birthrate crisis and its solutions.
