The four panelists discussed the prospects for peace on and reunification of the Korean Peninsula and how Japan can contribute to it.

How to improve strained relations between Japan and South Korea was also explored. Three panelists who have been working on promoting friendship between Japan and South Korea gave presentations on three topics related to this: (1) "Differences in History Education Between Japan and South Korea," (2) "Difference Between National Character and Relationships," and (3) "What Both People Can Do to Promote Friendship Between Japan and South Korea."

For the first topic, presentations were given by three young people who received history education in South Korea. They explained that Japanese and South Korean textbooks present different accounts and viewpoints of the same events in history.

For the second topic, three panelists spoke about the differences between Korean culture, which values emotions, and Japanese culture, which values harmony. They also discussed how Korean people relate to colleagues like family.

For the third topic, the panelists and participants considered what Japanese and Koreans can do to improve relations and promote friendship between Japan and South Korea. There was an opinion that it is important for the peoples of both nations to understand each other's history and national character.

Finally, Mr. Hiroaki Takeuchi, president of YSP-Japan, praised the fruitful discussion and highlighted that it was based on real experiences that youth had in both countries. He also proposed more discussions among young people, the next generation, be organized.

One of the participants shared a reflection: "Opportunities like this to discuss the differences between Japan and South Korea are very valuable. We would like to [develop] this friendship into a movement that extends beyond our community to the general public."
