Y. Whedbee, a young Unificationist from Atlanta, Georgia, led a Youth Divine Principle Study at the Atlanta Beltline. The 11 young participants usually gather every other week to read and share what they gained from their Divine Principle study.

After reading chapters on the Purpose of Creation and the Human Fall, the group had a lively discussion about what they read. The discussion spanned three major themes: the achievements of human history, the failures of human history, and how to create a perfect world.

What stood out during the discussions is that everyone had different views of what the perfect world would be like. The group concluded that the world would be a better place if people saw and treated everybody from God's perspective.
