Dr. Hak Ja Han: A Journey of Faith, Sacrifice, and Global Providence

This animated documentary portrays pivotal chapters in Dr. Hak Ja Han's life, from her early calling as a teenager in post-war Korea to her central role alongside Reverend Sun Myung Moon in expanding the Unification Church's global outreach.

Amid the Cold War's ideological battles, she supported massive missionary deployments to over 127 countries, including risky operations behind the Iron Curtain like Operation Butterfly, where followers faced arrests, torture, and executions in places such as Czechoslovakia. Personal anecdotes highlight her sacrifices, such as prioritizing aid for missionaries over her own children, underscoring a commitment to fostering world peace through faith despite immense personal and communal hardships.

This narrative captures the broader historical tensions between religious movements and authoritarian regimes, illustrating how one woman's resolve helped build a network now spanning over 190 nations.

Shinzo Abe's Murder and Hate Speech: Who Crossed the Line?

by Massimo Introvigne

Anti-cult journalist Eight Suzuki typed on X a phrase that should haunt anybody who believes that words matter. He wants us to believe Shinzo Abe's assassination "was unexpected but made sense." Unexpected, yes, but somehow logical. Suzuki means that the assassin's feelings are understandable. They make sense to him. That phrase alone should make the blood run cold. Because when a journalist starts finding reasons for murder, he isn't just reporting anymore—he is flirting with justification.

Suzuki's narrative is simple, almost seductively so: Abe once kept his distance from the Unification Church, although he was supported by it, then cozied up, culminating in a 2021 video message to a church-related event praising its leader. That message, Suzuki insists, was the moment Abe "crossed a line." Victims of the church, he says, felt despair. The media failed to denounce Abe. And so, the assassin acted.
