They Pulled the Wrong Thread: And the Curtain Came Down

The last several days have reshaped the entire landscape of what has been called the Unification Church case. What was once portrayed as a narrow scandal aimed at a single political camp has now opened into a wider and far more revealing picture. Testimony, photographs, and courtroom exchanges have shown that the political contacts in question did not occur on only one side. Figures from both major parties were participating in similar interactions, often around the same events and with the same individuals.

This is no longer an assumption or a defensive claim. It is a matter of public record. Political actors from the ruling party and the opposition both attended international gatherings connected to the church, both sought access to global guests, and both engaged in forms of political contact that were initially described as the exclusive wrongdoing of one camp. The facts have expanded far beyond the original frame, and the question now before the country is straightforward: what exactly is the legal standard being applied?
