Rev. Demian Dunkley's update on True Mother

Dr. Han returned to the detention center on Saturday following the suspension of execution. On Sunday afternoon, she experienced a severe nosebleed in the restroom at the detention facility. As it was Sunday, the medical officer at the detention center was off duty. Therefore, her attending physician at Magnolia was contacted. According to the physician, the bleeding was severe enough that the trash bin was filled with blood-soaked tissues, and the situation was considered an emergency.

South Korea: A Law to Dissolve Churches at Will

South Korea's Parliament is currently considering a legal amendment that is so extensive and dismissive of constitutional protections that one might question whether its authors expect the public to read beyond the introduction. The proposal states, in its official explanation, that current law permits authorities to revoke a nonprofit corporation's establishment permit only when it "conducts activities outside its stated purpose, violates the conditions of its establishment permit, or engages in acts harmful to the public interest." It then expresses concern that "cases have occurred in which organizations commit anti-social acts, such as colluding with specific political forces in violation of the constitutional principle of separation of religion and state," yet there are not enough legal means to sanction them effectively. The drafters also argue that even when authorities identify wrongdoing, "the lack of clear investigative authority makes effective supervision structurally difficult." Their proposed solution is to "clarify the grounds for revoking establishment permits, codify investigative powers, and strengthen the system that requires the remaining assets of anti-social corporations to go to the national treasury, thus preventing abuse of corporate status and protecting constitutional order."
