When Courts Interpret Doctrine: A Japanese Scholar's Concerns About the Unification Church Decision

Professor Masaki Nakamasa denounces the misinterpretation of its theology in the verdict that dissolved the Family Federation.

What surprised me after reading the High Court decision was that the court developed its own interpretation of the doctrines of the Family Federation (formerly known as the Unification Church) and used it to justify the dissolution order. Since only those involved can know how they understand and practice the doctrines, the law should not intrude on that, and the fundamental principle of modern law is to maintain neutrality in evaluating doctrines. In a case where the question was whether wooden mandalas were objects of faith in Nichiren Shoshu, the Supreme Court stated that “the authenticity of objects of faith, which are the essence of religion, and the issue of doctrines that should be resolved religiously are matters that directly concern inner faith, and are not matters that the court can definitively resolve by applying laws and regulations” (Supreme Court, Showa 51 [O] No. 749, April 7, 1981, Third Petty Bench, Supreme Court Civil Case Reports Vol. 35 No. 3, p. 462). Pastor Resfred Arthur’s public appeal highlighting our commitment to racial harmony and global peace

Members of the Family Federation for World Peace and Unification from Japan delivered an emotional public appeal highlighting their church's long-standing commitment to racial harmony and global peace. They shared a personal family story from the 1992 Los Angeles riots, where a young Japanese missionary mother prayed to become a bridge between African American and Korean communities. She was later matched in marriage to an African man by Reverend Sun Myung Moon, and their children were given names symbolizing unification and peace. The speaker described this as part of the church's broader mission to overcome divisions and build a world where people see one another as brothers and sisters.

The Heavenly Blueprint Etched Across Four South American Nations

Last week, in my first report from the 21-day Heavenly South America tour, I spoke about the Jardim Holy Ground. True Parents poured their devotion and love into the providence in South America over so many years, and that faith remains alive today in Jardim, which stands at the heart of that providence. It is far more than a beautiful natural setting; it is a sacred ground infused with True Parents' heart and dedication as they strove to realize a world surpassing even the ideal of the Garden of Eden.
