Governance- Non-profits and faith communities with Jim Dougherty, Gregg Noll, Mike Mickler, Mark Isaacs, Noah Ross

The rationale for good governance begins at the individual and organizational level, but has implications for the wider society.

One of the main issues that the Unification Movement speaks to is the global need for good governance e.g. through the Universal Peace Federation

This session will provide a positive, introductory discussion on governance at the non-profit level and the faith community level, looking at models of (good) governance which can help usher in healthier political, social and economic environments at the local level with implication for the national and international levels.

This may include such topics as: regulatory, tax and legal compliance; donor confidence and financial accountability; member confidence, morale and empowerment; preservation and protection of organizational assets; protection against abuse, fraud, waste or other misuse of funds; evaluation of effectiveness and efficiency of programs, campaigns or other efforts; organizational unity, credibility, influence and impact within the larger society; models for peaceful coexistence, harmony, justice and freedom; institutionalization of best practices, learned from the achievements of human civilization and from experience.

A long range vision could be an Institute of Governance Studies, possibly at UTS. An institute which would be able to support the work of affiliated Unificationist organizations, but also governments, corporations etc. seeking to move the world toward better governance.
